

Earl's Diary - Saturday - June 1, 2013

Today is a travel day. We left Keystone at 7:30am. After a brief stop for groceries, we headed west on I-90. Shortly after that we took off on a side highway looking for State Highway 212 because we wanted to avoid the interstate and see some back country.

Highway 212 from Belle Fourche, South Dakota to Crow Agency, Montana on I-90 travels through the historical lands where Custer was chasing the Native Americans to no avail. Between 1865 and 1877 American Indians fought to retain their land and culture while U.S. Army enforced orders from Washington D.C. This stretch of highway is now designated "Warrior Trail"

Of course, we all know what ultimately happened to Custer at Little Big Horn.

We arrived at 7th Ranch RV Camp in good time and had time to relax before exploring everything Custer tomorrow. I even had a chance to do a much needed load of laundry.

I was much disappointed because we didn't have any rain today. In fact, the sun was out and we were able to have our trailer doors open.

I wanted to show how green everything is around here. We did speak to one gentleman at a rest stop, and he said it had been very dry until a couple weeks ago. Ranchers and farmers were getting worried. The RV Park we are staying at had rain yesterday. That made some parts of the park a little muddy.

That's about it for this time. Thanks for coming along with me. Bye for now - - Earl
